A variance is a form of regulatory relief that is granted when the exact application of a development standard (usually involving height, size, massing, setbacks or other site location criteria) contained in the City’s land development code results in “peculiar or unusual practical difficulties” in meeting certain zoning requirements. The City has established a variance process to provide land owners with additional flexibility where the zoning ordinance has not anticipated every variation of the physical characteristics of land or the actual method of conduct of business in the community. The City’s Planning and Zoning Board, acting as the “Board of Adjustment”, has the authority to review and make final decisions regarding terms and conditions of regulatory relief through the administration of variance applications.
